Though my father had married her, such a mar-riage was not legal in Cuba. Her death, which befell me in my sixteenth year, was the first sorrow I had known; it left our home bereaved of its at-tractions, cast a shadow of melancroly on my youth, and wrought in my father a tragic and durable change.

Months went by. With the elasticity of my years I regained some of the mirth that had before distinguished me; the plantation smiled with fresh crops; the negroes on the estate had already forgotten my mother and transferred their simple obedience to myself; but still the cloud only darkened on the brows of Senor Valdevia. my father.
